The United States is currently debating a host of important topics about education, including how to allocate power between the federal, state, and local governments; whether the primary purpose of schools is primarily to workers or citizens; whether American schools should be run like businesses; and whether America should emulate other countries’ education systems, and if so, which ones. This course aims to introduce students to the academic discipline of political science by showing what it can contribute to understanding and entering these debates.

The course begins by explaining how political scientists study the institutions, interests, and ideas involved in any policy debate. Next, we survey how the subfields of political science—American politics, political theory, comparative politics, and international relations—provide insights on current political debates. In American politics, we study the transition from local to state and federal control of education, focusing particularly on the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 and its reauthorizations. In political theory, we consider how John Dewey laid the foundation for progressive politics that has been challenged by economists such as Milton Friedman who want to apply market principles to education. In comparative politics, we examine how scholars have studied other countries—particularly in Singapore, Finland, and Australia—for insights about how the US should reform its education system. And in international relations, we investigate how scholars have used economic and national security arguments to justify transforming American schools and how Yong Zhao argues that America should not emulate Asian countries with high test scores.

In the final part of the course, students research and present a report on letter grades, standardized tests, PTA fundraising, police officers in schools, the Individuals with Disabilities Act (IDEA), and school discipline guidelines.

Student learning objectives

By the end of the semester, students should be able to successfully:
  • Know the methodologies and research focus of the five main subfields of political science: American politics, comparative politics, international relations, political theory, and public policy.
• Demonstrate knowledge of the history of American education policy, including the shifting allocation of power between local education authorities, states, and the federal government.
• Understand the normative debate about whether schools should focus on training workers or citizens.
• Place American education debates in a global context.
• Research, write about, present on, and contribute to education policy debates.

Course Requirements

(1) September 25: Before class, send me an electronic copy of a 3000-word encyclopedia entry on the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. Write the entry with 10+ academic sources, subheadings, and formatted in the style of an academic article (see here). As an EP course, students will have a chance to revise the paper for up to a one-letter grade improvement due one week after I return the paper with comments.

(2) One week before the midterm, I will distribute 6 essay questions, and on the day of the exam we will roll a die to determine 2 questions. Good answers should incorporate material from the lectures, readings, presentations, and your own thoughts. You may study in groups, but the exam is close-booked. The exam is 1 hour.

(3, 4) Near the end of the semester, students will participate a group presentation on a controversial topic in education policy. Each student is expected to write his or her own 3000-word research paper w/ 10+ academic sources, subheadings, and formatted in the style of an academic article. For presentations, groups should make a Powerpoint that provides an overview of the history and debates on the topic. Groups should send email me a few sources to distribute to students to read before class. Find activities and pose questions to spark a lively conversation.

(5) The final has the same format as the midterm.

(6) Class participation.
